This was one of the Giants' days. Of course, Brooklyn rooters had no complaints to make. They seem to know nothing during a game but how to root. And how they did how this afternoon! They were here in no small number to blend voices either, for they ran into the thousands.

Big Crowd Came Early.

The shin-toasting stands held their quotas an hour before the game began. and folks were still coming after that. The scene all around the diamond made the day look like a Brooklyn holiday. Everybody who knows anything about baseball was out. The ticket agents were kept busy, and the rust which had grown on the cogs of the turnstiles during the Dodgers' stay in the West was well worn off long before 3.30 o'clock. Some New Yorkers, too, pushed their the gathering of two clans. The old New York-Brooklyn rivalry is as rampant to-day as in the days of a half dozen years ago and where residents of
